Subject: A2(1) What should 'actual situation' constitute

    Move To:

This should mean two things:

1. According to the maturity of Hong Kong people in conducting politics responsibly and sensibly.
2. It depends on the democracy apatite of HK people.

For point 1, I feel that Hong Kong is very matured for universal suffrage -- in any case, we will be more so by 2007-08.

For point 2, this was clearly demonstrated in the recent two demonstrations in July 2003 and January 2004 as well as the high turn-out in the 2003 election exercise.

Subject: A2(2) How 'gradual and orderly progress' should be understood

    Move To:

To my understanding, ten to eleven years by 2007-08 should be more than long enough to satisfy the "gradual and orderly" requirement. Comes 2007-08, HK people will definitely be ready for universal suffrage.

Subject: A3(1) Meet 'the interests of the different sectors of society'

    Move To:

When these views were made in 1990, the Chinese leader quite understandably sounded caution as HK had no experience of conducting local politics and as a result such view was to include functional and other non-election-based constituencies in order to maintain "stability". 17/18 years down the line, HK no longer needs this kind of non-democratic institution to represent different interests.

By 2007-08, universal suffrage should take care of this aspect and, like all other well-tried democracy models, should represent all sectors of society automatically.

To develop this, all HK needs are good and sound governance, accountability and rule of law. Universal suffrage should take care of this.
